Three Wins in Iowa Against HIV Criminalization

August 5, 2014 By Trent Straube

All eyes have been on Iowa. More than 170 people representing 27 states attended the nation's first HIV Is Not a Crime conference, held this summer in Grinnell, Iowa. "The energy was incredible," recalls Eric Evans, an advocate from Shreveport, Louisiana. "And everyone there was striving toward a common goal: to change discriminatory HIV laws." Attendees got a few bolts of optimism: Iowa's governor signed legislation revising the state's HIV laws, and the high court overturned the conviction of Nick Rhoades, an HIV-positive man who was originally sentenced to 25 years in prison after he had sex with another man (Rhoades was undetectable, they used a condom, and HIV was not transmitted). At the conference, both Rhoades and Donald Bogardus—another man convicted under Iowa's old HIV laws—had their GPS ankle monitors removed in front of cheering crowds.
