

The Way We Live Now: Rafael Campo

Doctor, Poet

May 1, 1999

Elegy for the AIDS Virus

How difficult it is to say goodbye to scourge. For years we were obsessed with you, your complex glycoproteins and your sly, haphazard reproduction, your restraint in your resistance, how you bathed so slight yet fierce in our most intimate secretions.

We will remember you for generations; electron micrographs of you seem quaint already, in the moment of our victory.
How difficult it is to claim one's right to living honestly. The honesty you taught was nothing quite as true as death, but neither was it final. Yes, we vanquished you, with latex, protease inhibitors, a little common sense—what's that, you say? That some remain at risk?

How dare you try to threaten us again!
Of course, you'd like to make outrageous claims that some behaviors haven't changed, that some have not had access to the drugs that mask your presence in the body. Difficult it is, how very sad, to see you strain (no pun intended) at response—our quilts, our bravest poetry, our deaths with grace and dignity have put you in your place.

This elegy itself renounces you, as from this consciousness you've been erased.

The love for you was very strong, the hot pursuits so many of us reveled in—but what once felt like love was really not.

I hardly know what I will find to hate as much as I have loved and hated what you brought to bear upon my verse, the weight of your oppression and the joys of truth.

How difficult it is—to face the white of nothingness, of clarity. We win!

Copyright (c) 1999 by Rafael Campo. From "The Changing Face of AIDS" in Diva, to be published by Duke University Press in September 1999.