The 36th annual AIDS Walk Delaware added a shot of something new: participants at the HIV fundraising event had the chance to get monkeypox and flu vaccines.

“[Monkeypox] is greatly affecting gay men or men who have sex with men,” John Beckley, the director of development and marketing at AIDS Delaware, told WHY.org. “The same way that we were here at the beginning of the AIDS epidemic and the HIV virus, we should step up and see what we can do for the community by providing the vaccine at our walk.”

Indeed, as POZ reported last month, although anyone can contract monkeypox, about 40% of people with monkeypox are living with HIV, though that number may be much higher in some communities. People whose HIV is well controlled, however, don't seem to have worse monkeypox symptoms. (For a collection of articles on the topic, click #Monkeypox and #Monkeypox Vaccine.)

AIDS Walk Delaware was held September 17 in two locations—Wilmington and Rehoboth Beach—to support HIV services, raise awareness and honor those lost to the epidemic. The AIDS walk usually draws over 600 participants, including speakers, marching bands, walkers, volunteers and entertainers.
