A former employee at a restaurant and bar in Texarkana, Texas, filed a federal lawsuit alleging he was fired from the job in March 2019 because he has HIV, reports the Texarkana Gazette.

The lawsuit was filed against Hopkins Icehouse Holdings LLC, the company that managed the restaurant last March (the eatery is now operated under a different name and management).

According to the lawsuit, Nicholas Watson said that when he was terminated from his job at Hopkins Icehouse on Gibson Lane, a general manager referenced Watson’s HIV status as a reason for ending his employment. “We’re worried it’s going to affect business, like revenue,” he allegedly told Watson.

Watson seeks compensation for “back pay, front pay, loss of fringe benefits, loss of bonuses and other costs. The complaint asks for punitive damages, attorney fees and court costs as well,” reports the Texarkana Gazette.

Watson claims his employer’s actions violated the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), which prohibits public entities from discriminating against people who have disabilities, including HIV. The Department of Labor and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission help enforce and investigate claims involving the Americans with Disabilities Act.
