Phoenix, Arizona
Positive since 2008

I became positive in 2008. I had health insurance, a stable work and home, and I had recently relocated to Arizona from Virginia. After a routine blood check on Valentine's Day, my doctor broke the news. Afterward, I went back to work. My doctor's advice was, "Do not disclose at work. People living with HIV can live a normal life."

I was nothing from normal. I was new to the area, with no friends and a high sex drive that quickly disappeared. Before all this, I loved to drink after work, clean the pool, do house chores, walk my dog, and if I was in the mood then maybe I'd have a meaningless sexual encounter. After all, being single in a new town had its rewards.

That Valentine's night was different. I had to change my habits and clean up my act. No more screwing around, and it was time to get serious about future life contributions. If I was going to die, I wanted to leave my mark.

I quit smoking and drinking cold turkey. I stopped drinking coffee, drank more water, and started taking vitamins and eating a healthy diet.

In my head I kept thinking, "I can fix this and beat the stigma." I was in denial but as time passed, the cleaning of my system help me see things clearly.

I started taking Atripla, which led to some groggy mornings, but otherwise, I was doing well. I received high work evaluations and my concentration to succeed was more clear than ever. Performance by example was my daily motto.

Next thing I had to deal with was my family. It had been too long, and I decide it was time to storm back into their life, because I wanted to make sure the right-wing extremist side of my family woke up to reality. I was successful and felt comfortable standing up to them. I was sure I could hold my ground. It proved to be a test. But I am an equal with no less education, and I made it all on my own. I never asked for a penny or took anything.

At the dinnertable, my sister said, "I don't accept you, but you are my brother."

I replied, "It's OK, because you are a Republican, and I accept your ignorance."

She answered, "The Republican party is a Christian party with family values." Hiding her hate behind Christian values is something she does well. This will not change, but I don't let it affect me. I make sure I am there for every family get-together. I just have to be me. So far, it seems to be working and the walls are breaking down.

My past lovers were wonderful guys and I am still friends with all of them. I remain in contact, and they all know about my status. They are not positive, but time has not been gentle with them.

My doctor is Ken Fisher, an HIV specialist. I am lucky to live a mile away from his office and two miles away from his house. I follow his rules about healthy habits. I changed my meds and now feel like a totally normal person. I look better now than I did when I was negative. I love my doctor—he is the best. I am undetectable and have been for six years.

I know I am awesome in bed, but I have not been able to let loose until recently. I went five years without sex. I am slowly starting to open up to dating. I get approached by all the wrong young, negative guys. I am starting to make trips to Palm Springs, and I feel relaxed in that community. There is good support there as well as good-looking HIV-positive men.

I have added a beautiful guest house to my property. Someday my family will visit me and I will be ready to show them that I am just as normal as they are.
