

Based on Her True Story

Music and action in the poetry of Mary Bowman

It has been five years since Mary Bowman first took the mic and disclosed her biggest secret to a live audience—she was born with HIV 26 years ago, in a Maryland suburb outside of Washington, DC, to a drug-addicted mother who died when Bowman was just 3 years old.

“The sickness she denied lies in my blood with a lesser value,” is the big reveal in her poem “Dandelions,” the first work she performed that declared her fears about dealing with her HIV status growing up.

Since Bowman’s award-winning poetry collection, LOTUS, was published in 2011, the poet and songwriter has been at the forefront of a growing movement that uses storytelling and art to educate others about HIV/AIDS and to destroy the related stigma that can be as deadly as the virus itself.

Between recording her first R&B album, hosting monthly poetry open mics across the DC area and teaching her creative craft to local kids, Bowman has performed her poetry at HIV events and at colleges across the East Coast. In this edited POZ interview, the artist reflects on her accomplishments and shares her plans for the future.

What was the initial reaction to LOTUS?

I did the book because at that time in my life I was dealing with depression, dealing with anxiety. I’d been in and out of the hospital for mental illness and I just wanted to have something that I could commit to and follow through with. To go through the whole process of writing the poetry, getting the pages together—it was an amazing accomplishment.

I didn’t put the book out to receive accolades or book sales. There’s a company out of Philadelphia called 2 Pens & Lint; a friend of mine runs it, so I went through them to publish it.

But when I finished it, it just became this big thing—people telling me all the time, “When I fell down, I read your book,” coming to me and saying, “I started crying when I read that poem.” That kind of response was really big. Bigger than I thought it would be, because I didn’t think it would be anything.

That might have something to do with the fact that the book won the National Underground Spoken Word

Award in 2011. And the fact that people started comparing you to Maya Angelou...

When I won that award, I didn't even know I could be nominated. That was one of the best moments of my career.

That people even consider me in the same sentence as Maya Angelou—she's one of my biggest inspirations, somebody that I read up on a lot. Big shoes to fill. I hope one day I'll be able to live up to the standard that people hold me to.

Love B.O.A.T.S., your new album available on iTunes and Amazon, is a lot different from LOTUS. Are you moving away from poetry?

When I started performing, it was strictly poetry. But then someone found out that I could sing and was like, "Why don't you write songs?" I wouldn't say I'm moving from one thing to another—I think I'm just trying to fuse them together more.

I recorded all the tracks with my producer Kwame, a.k.a. Oeaux, in his home studio, along with Jacob Avis. I met them through connections, through poetry, and we had this awesome, amazing chemistry working with each other.

As for the album, there's a little bit of soul in there, jazz, there's a touch of classical, there's a touch of R&B. Musically, I really don't know which one to pick, especially because there's spoken word on there as well.

What is the album about?

It's a love story. I am kind of a hopeless romantic. I'm a softie. I love love. I had an awakening experience in a recent relationship I was in where the end was a little messy and really hurtful on both sides. I didn't really have any other way to release that energy besides art and music. I decided to name the album Love B.O.A.T.S. for "Based on a True Story."

The name is also a play on a local drug here in DC with the name "Love Boat." I've never tried this drug, but when I looked up the side effects, it's like, you start seeing things, you hear things. It's very cosmic, very euphoric, and you think that things are going to be one way and then the come down of the drug is really harsh. The fall of that relationship was a lot like being on a Love Boat trip.

Did your status factor into that relationship?

No. I have been blessed to deal with women who really don't care about others' opinions. The people that they love are the people that they love, regardless of what people say or think. So, in that way, it was a regular relationship. We talked more about TV than about HIV.

Are you continuing your HIV activism?

Definitely. I usually have the most performances when there are AIDS awareness days. I recently performed at a fashion show at James Madison University, and I did a stigma conference at Howard University. I also do open mics in DC and just became a host at [poetry venue] Busboys and Poets in Virginia.

I'm still working at the Women's Collective. We take women in from the community who want to become advocates. We coordinate training sessions, group activities, take them out to [Ryan White Planning Council] meetings, just really get them used to being an advocate and what that means and how they can help their community in their own ways.

I'm also still working on P.O.E.T., or Purpose Over Entertainment. I'm trying to turn it into something like an entertainment business where, if you need an [HIV-positive] advocate to come speak at your event, through poetry, singing, art or whatever, then we'll have somebody who can do that.

What are your plans as an HIV-positive artist?

Over the next five years, I would like more professional gigs in other countries. I want to see myself having at least two more CDs and to finish my book I'm currently writing.

I don't want to say the title of my book, because I don't want to do the whole "spoiler alert" thing, but it's a book about the parts of me I don't share on stage, about my HIV status. It's going to be a mix of poetry, journal entries and short stories of actual things that have happened in my life.

I am also working on another concept album that is going to be more HIV-focused. I hope to have the album out by December 1, so we can do a World AIDS Day premiere.

I'm also going to be this year's ambassador for the U.S. Department of Health Office of Women's Health for their Women and Girls HIV/AIDS Awareness Day, mostly doing social media, tweeting out about the event.

What drives you to continue with your performance career?

I want to show people living with HIV that they don't have to hide their status, even if they pursue their dreams. I want to de-stigmatize the entertainment world, to show little girls that grew up like me—who didn't see anybody who had HIV doing what I wanted to do—that they can achieve whatever they want to do.

I Know What HIV Looks Like

HIV looks like a child

Birthered through a bloody disease ridden canal

Into a world that would make dying seem worth your while

It looks like a child

Born with an enlarged spleen

Packaged with the inability to do things

Like join America's great Army or be all that she could be

Or simply live a life of normality

Because the cool kids think HIV is ugly

And she looks just like it

Swollen lymph nodes and all

All because her mother made one false move

One high that came down too soon

Her mother was doomed to a life full of death

And so was she

It was predicted that she would breathe her last breath before 5

But now

Here she stands 5 foot 9

15 years after her expected demise

Flashing a smile that blinds eyes trying to see her pain

Her breath carries hints of disdain

But she mustn't remain silent

No matter how bad it stinks
She can't allow people to go on and think
That HIV only looks like
Skinny bodies, pale skin, open sores, and baby thin hair
She can't help but start a movement that does more than just wear red t-shirts on December 1st
No matter how much it hurts
She was cursed with this enigma so she sets out to slay this fire breathing stigma of HIV
And pray that the world will no longer be bullies
But become fully aware that they are just jealous of the Magic in Irving's HIV money
And his HIV AMC's
And his HIV Grande' latte's
And what ever other HIV things he has
You see HIV looks like a healthy man with sick paper
Who didn't ask for the haters
Looks like little girls in South Africa that didn't ask for the rapers HIV looks like Niggas With Attitude watching Eazy leave 10 days after going to the doctor for what he believed to be asthma
HIV looks like a boy receiving the wrong blood transfusion at 13 one who would one day bring awareness to this thing once called the gay man's disease and lose his life at 18
Ryan White lived 5 years longer then expected
Because God wanted to show the world what HIV looks like
And it damn sure don't look like BET's lame excuse for promoting awareness through 30 second commercials in interlude to videos of men telling our young women to have a baby by them after they've blamed it on the alcohol wasted
These young women become consumed in their mother's basement
Trapped between walls of ignorance laying in their innocence bare naked
As HIV stares them in the eyes they don't know that they too will soon know that HIV looks like
And it looks like cocktails that don't get served during happy hour
But get served in the form of a capsule or pill to kill this disease that seeks to devour our young
And leave them orphanized in the concrete jungles of Washington DC
And add insult to injury by telling them that dandelions don't belong in the midst of roses
Takes peace and teases them by holding it underneath of their noses
But what HIV doesn't know is
I've known what it looks like for years
I have cried its abandoned tears and I've lived with the fear of dying
Been caught flying without wings and I've been found lying in cold prayers
On floor 3 of children's national medical center
Realizing that I don't own the luxury of only having colds in the winter
But opportunistic diseases left me asking Jesus when summer was really going to begin
When was I going to be able to ride my bike arms stretch wide caressing the wind with the same hands used by God to compose symphonies in the key of brokenness
I know what HIV looks like
Every morning I stare it in the eyes realizing that even though my biological mother's memory can't not be found in my mind I am the only one of my siblings that carries her blood line
I am the only one of my siblings blessed with a life full of positivity
I know what HIV looks like
And I will continue to live my life exposing the ever changing face of HIV
So that the world will no longer be bullies

But become fully aware that if it only takes 32 people to die for a nation to become Hokies
Then surely the death of over 25 million people should bring the world to become a sea of red ribbons
So HIV will no longer look like anything but extinct
Please don't misunderstand me
Knowing what HIV looks like
Comes with the price of my life nailed to a ruthless disease
But I'd rather die telling people what HIV looks like then to live with knowing I haven't said a word.
