The new issue of POZ is out, entitled "Suppression Superheroes". You can check it out by clicking here.

Inspired by this issue, I want to spend the next month highlighting some folks who I deem to be superheroes among us. They'll range from people I've met in flesh in blood, to people who I've merely observed in the stars from my lowly terrestrial perch.

First up is John Oliver. I've been a fan of his since his first appearances as a correspondent on The Daily Show. But my appreciation for John grew beyond his talents as a comedian when he donated his talents to an HIV/AIDS fundraiser (AIDS Walk NY) that my friends and I were participating in 2007 and 2008.

Here's Gwenn fanning out as she introduces John in 2007:

On his HBO show, "Last Week with John Oliver", John has incorporated the issue of clean needles into a children's song, and also tackled the issue of sex education in America's public schools. Check out his take on sex ed below:

What makes John Oliver a superhero to me is his common sense, the uncommon ability to use his comedic skills to open hearts to difficult topics and his empathy for man and womankind.

Positively Yours,
Shawn
