

Eight HIV Organizations That Empower Black Communities

We cannot end the HIV epidemic without prioritizing the health and well-being of Black people.

June 25, 2020 By AIDS United

The mission of AIDS United is to end the HIV epidemic in the United States. We cannot achieve that without prioritizing the health and well-being of Black people.

As HIV advocates, it is our responsibility to speak out against police brutality and institutional racism. As an organization, AIDS United pledges to continue placing racial justice at the core of everything we do and to work with other community-based organizations and HIV advocates to fight back against racist violence, racist systems and racist health disparities. There is nothing specific about Black bodies that are more susceptible to HIV, and yet nearly half of new HIV diagnoses in the United States are among Black people.

If you or your organization is looking to support or learn from those who are actively impacting HIV rates in Black communities, here's a list of eight organizations who are doing amazing work:

Black Women's Health Imperative — Washington, D.C.

The Black Women's Health Imperative focuses specifically on the health and wellness disparities faced by Black women and girls. Created by Black women for the needs of their communities, Black Women's Health Imperative provides educational networks focused on the prevention of HIV for cisgender and transgender Black women.
