Miley Cyrus & Rihanna TittyF#%k AIDS (In A Good Way)

November 3, 2014 By Shawn Decker

At a recent amfAR fundraiser, Miley Cyrus and Rihanna showed up in risque and boob-revealing outfits. Which is the same thing as saying that President Obama showed up to a State of the Union address wearing a tie. Some people may have been put off- but the outfits turned heads and made headlines, thus making many fans of both artists aware that their heroes support the HIV/AIDS cause.

What's even better than that? The fact that Miley and Rihanna's hearts didn't just hide behind those breasts. Anyone who was upset by their appearance were quickly silenced by the generous donations that both stars made at the event, which helped amfAR raise over $3 million.

Being a rockstar isn't just about singing the songs, playing the shows, making the mad money or looking the part; being a rockstar is ultimately about rocking the world. And contributing money and raising awareness about the need for continued research for a cure for HIV is about as rockin' as it gets. I've been living with HIV since I was 11, a time when I fell in love with Belinda Carlisle's "Heaven on Earth" album. I want to live to see the day when HIV is cured- so myself and others can live the healthiest lives possible.

Now that's heaven on Earth, right?

Thanks again, Miley and RiRi. Big HIV-positive hugs to you both!

Positively Yours,
Shawn
