Screenings of Positive Women: Exposing Injustice and HIV is Not a Crime

February 28, 2013 By Sean Strub

Not long ago, I watched Positive Women: Exposing Injustice, a 45 minute documentary produced by the Canadian HIV/AIDS Legal Network about how HIV criminalization affects women. It is an amazing film and not only addresses the impact of criminalization, but also conveys brilliantly how complicated--and potentially dangerous--HIV disclosure can be, especially for women.

Next Thursday, March 7, Positive Women: Exposing Injustice will be screened along with Sero Project's short documentary, HIV is Not a Crime, with a panel discussion afterwards, at the SVA Theatre at 333 Eighth Avenue in New York. Broadway Cares, Housing Works, Visual AIDS, the International Community of Women with HIV/AIDS and Positive Women - USA are partners in the event and it is going to be a fascinating and thoughtful evening.

Panelists include Allison Duke, director of Positive Women: Exposing Injustice; Richard Elliott, executive director of the Canadian HIV/AIDS Legal Network; Robert Suttle, assistant director of the Sero Project (seen in HIV Is Not a Crime) and Jessica Whitbread, global chair of the International Community of Women Living with HIV (featured in Positive Women: Exposing Injustice). I'll be moderating.

We still have a limited number of free tickets available. If you're interested, click here to RSVP to Broadway Cares. Sorry, limit is two tickets per person.

It's a great chance to enjoy two excellent films, connect with other advocates combating HIV criminalization and learn more about how we can stop HIV stigma, discrimination and criminalization. I'm looking forward to it.
