Told ya

December 2, 2009 By Peter Staley

A prediction from a little over 13 months ago:

> “...the next big change in the guidelines will come within two years, and recommend starting treatment when CD4’s fall below 500.”

AIDSmeds.com has a great overview of the latest updates to the HIV treatment guidelines.

It was also cool to finally see Kaletra demoted from a “preferred” to an “alternative” option for those starting treatment for the first time (except pregnant women, where it remains a preferred option). Kaletra is sold by Abbott, and they’re still screwing us with that 400% price increase on Norvir. I never understood why more docs and patients weren’t trying more lipid-friendly options like Reyataz. Now they will.

© 2026 Smart + Strong All Rights Reserved.